Log Cabin brochure

The Republic of Texas, entering into statehood, retained ownership of its public lands joint with the burden of its public debt, a situation unique in the nation where control of the public lands vests in the Federal Domain. In 1846 there appears the law establishing the general land office of the state, and, borne of this act, as of February 2, 1854, there was established a board consisting of the Governor, the Land Commissioner, the Treasurer, and the Comptroller of the State, charged with the erection of a fireproof building to house the department's activities at a cost not to exceed the appropriated sum of $40,000, and to be located on block 136 at College (12th) and Brazos streets. It was completed in mid 1857.

This building is a rich repository in the history of the state and its people. It is believed to be the oldest existing public building in the capital city, and it has been designated worthy of preservation by the Historic American Building Survey. As is the Alamo, Battle-Shrine in the struggle to hold to our people the land, here stands the theater for the less sanguine contest for its control.

Here, working as a draftsman, William Sidney Porter, the luminant "O Henry," gained the atmosphere of his pungent "Bexar Script No. 2492," in which the secret staircase appears as a prop. Here, the intricacies of the Spanish Land Grants were unwoven. Here the plats, the charts, the mineral maps were prepared, many of them in a manner of draftsmanship rivaling that of the illuminated manuscripts of the mediaeval monks. Ever, the land, the magnificent wealth of the great state, and here the habitat of those charged with its administration and the scene of the manoeuvrings for its possession!
